Dear FCC,

My name is Megan and I live in Winona, MN.

The principles of user choice and control are vitally important for a vibrant wireless ecosystem. But as written, the NPRM threatens to undermine these ideals by limiting what users can do with their devices. That's a concern, because I don't want to see community innovations, such as mesh networking, get cut off.

The draft rules could enable device manufacturers to forbid third-party software, which would keep me from using my custom wireless configuration.

To me technology allows for freedom of expression where people are able to share and discuss ideas, a right given to them by the first amendment. Limiting third party content limits the input of independent developers and researchers who should have the right to freely contribute to the wireless network. Basically, people shouldn't have to pay into a program just so they can contribute.

Sincerely,

Megan
