These telecom companies are really taking advantage of their service and making money from a regular customers, using a data cap to prevent customers usage of their internet and now charging streaming services for their services to reach to their customers. Net neutrality isn't applying to these scenarios it is not as open as it says to be. I have to pay for a premium to have full access for these services and online services paying so their connections won't be slowed down. I feel like the federal communication commission chair or whatever his position is titled to be is only lobbying the only few internet providers there are in this country. And of course this is not innovative at all, these cable companies are only lobbying for themselves and defying the purpose of what internet it was meant to be used for, share information, educate, communicate. Limiting this access is somewhat the violation of freedom speech.
