

In regards to the continual fight that RFDTV has to make to stay on the air, I simply want to say that it is bordering on discrimination. Though we have local channels available to us off an antennae, we receive the majority of our TV viewing channels through DISH network and RFDTV is the most viewed channel in our household. To be quite frank there are a lot of channels on the DISH network that we choose not to watch, we in fact note that there are quite a few Hispanic channels provided through DISH network. I might ask why I am paying for these channels when I'm quite certain that these are not popular channels in our area because we have very few Hispanic speaking people residing here. If these channels are not popular in our area why aren't they taken off the air? Just because RFDTV is not popular amongst the majority of TV viewers doesn't constitute a reason for dropping them. There are many rural, and as I understand, non-rural individuals who are watching RFDTV. The livelihood of the rural people is supported by this network with beneficial news and agriculture programs. This minority of people provide most of America and a lot of other countries with the food that ends up on their tables and into their stomachs. Must we take off the one network that helps them keep abreast of the happenings that support their livelihoods, as well as, supporting your food supply?
