I am a young entrepreneur and college student, optimistic about the future of what the internet can do for the US economy, spreading knowledge, and building community amongst people across the globe, and it means so much to me and many of my peers that the internet we all share remains a level playing field for both individuals and corporations.

There is a growing wealth gap plaguing the nation as identified by researchers and data scientists. This problem has been addressed by President Obama and persists in the dialogue of the current presidential campaign. Corporations and those at the top of the wealth pyramid do not need any more tools to protect their power and limit the mobility of those less fortunate and with less resources than them. Throttling internet speeds for those who can't afford the fast lane would keep American innovation in the web tech sector out of the fast lane. On the behalf of bright minds around the country using the internet to create value and stimulate growth, I urge that the FCC ensure net neutrality persists. Please keep the American Dream alive.

Thank you.
