I subscribe to cable services through Mediacom and I do not have any current issues with receiving RFD-TV but... Its imperative that this type of programming remains available to everyone for several reasons. Feeding the growing population of the world is the responsibility of the world wide agriculture community and the programs and topics discussed through this outlet are very important for all of us. This alone should be the only reason why Ag based programming needs to remain alive and active.

The current downturn in U.S. economic levels appears to be driving out some of the large Ag producers that we have become accustomed to seeing in rural America. Its has become common place to see large rural auctions where these large producers are forced to sell off equipment and farm ground in order to limit their losses in todays economics. The small to mid sized farmers are the guys picking up this ground and used equipment in small chunks. Its important as we go forward to keep the flow of information open to the farmers of tomorrow in order to support the growing world population and its need for food. By allowing these other cable companies to drop this programming is an injustice for the sharing of Ag based information.
