Here's three questions for you: 1) Could a communication company say it valued diversity if it dropped programming for rural Americans? 2) Could a group of individuals claim to be informed and educated if they ignored a foundational part of the American experience? 3) Could an organization say they fully contributed to the vitality of the American economy if they failed to support the people who produce food for the citizens of the US? If there is someone out there believes they could say 'yes' to any of these three questions, please email me at the address listed above because I want to give them a good one-on-one butt-chewing. Seriously.
