The rural communities of the USA feed not only the people of America, but many other nations via the process of exportation, by growing and raising vegetables, fruits, grains, beef, poultry, pork and numerous other products. Urban areas depend on the farmers, ranchers, etc. to feed them as do the executives and employees of the cable and satellite companies. Rural Americans help make these cable and satellite companies huge profits. Why can't these companies consider RFDTV and RFDHD a thank you to the people who feed us all? We deserve programming that we enjoy as we pay our bills just like urban Americans do. The FCC should NOT allow these companies to practice discrimination against a large segment of America.

Sincerely,
