Chairman Wheeler,

I'm writing to urge you to restore broadband competition by fixing the broken market for high-capacity broadband lines. I broke up with Comcast last week, finally fed up with excessive charges - thanks NPR for enlightening me on what other major metropolitan areas around the world pay (less) for their services (better). Only after I had reached the end of my rope did Comcast offer a solution 50% less than what I had been paying. But too late.

The FCC must address anti-competitive behavior in this market to reach its goal of delivering better, faster, cheaper broadband to all Americans. The future of our information economy depends on it. Larry Maloney
