Comment: Dear FCC,

It is time to eliminate the Universal Service program. I have lived in both urban and rural areas, and have no difficulty getting telephone or internet service. The wireless carriers have demonstrated the ability to blanket the country. Between cable, DSL, and satellite (and the wireless carriers themselves), rural areas have internet service.

The Communication Act of 1934 was intended to make telephone service ubiquitous. Great idea, and that job has been accomplished. There is no need for the FCC to continue to fish for new communication services to hang on Universal Service. What is next, the Internet of Things? Time to sunset a program.

As a President observed: "a government bureau is the nearest thing to eternal life we'll ever seen on this earth!"
