

Dear Chairman Wheeler,

Eight years ago, candidate Obama said, "we need a president who sees government not as a tool to enrich friends and high-priced lobbyists, but as the defender of fairness and opportunity for every American."

Four hundred and twenty Google White House meetings later, and it's become crystal clear that President Obama's views are very different.

The FCC's new "privacy" regulations are a blatant sop to Google, Obama's biggest corporate supporter. How can you say consumers "shouldn't have to sign away their right to privacy" to be on the Internet yet give a free pass to the worst privacy violator in history?

Google knows more about how I live my life than any company in history. To be online means Google knows my personal habits; where I go; what I watch on the Internet; even what I say to my family and friends. And they regularly use this private data about me for their own profit.

Google's own chairman says it best:

"We know where you are. We know where you've been. We can more or less know what you're thinking about."

So-called "privacy" regulations that give free rein to Obama ally and serial privacy violator Google shows that the only change this President has championed after eight years is blatant corporate cronyism.
