If so-called internet privacy rules don't apply to all corporations and make exemptions to such big internet privacy abusers as Google, for example, then the rules are a sham. The rules are obviously not interested in protecting individual privacy and only interested in showing favor to large corporations!

It certainly seems that the rules are being written to benefit those who contribute most to political campaigns. This being the case, to say that the goal is individual privacy is a blatant lie and shows great disrespect for the intelligence of the voters the government supposedly represents!
