Stop unwanted robocalls and the shady companies that rely on them. Their constant harassment is shameful, and the FCC and carriers have the power to stop it. The provision sneaked into the federal budget last fall, which would change allow collectors to robocall anyone with federal student loans or back taxes OR THEIR RELATIVES, is abhorrent.

Continue to strive to stop abusive robocalling; implement rules to provide as much protection as possible against abusive debt collection robocalls to our cell phones. We need the FCC to stay strong against debt collectors who want to open the floodgates to these calls.

Tell the FCC to implement the strongest possible rules against robocalls to cell phones.

The FCC's proposed rules set sensible guidelines for the types and frequency of calls and messages that debt collectors are allowed to make and send. They would also guarantee that anyone receiving a debt collection robocall is clearly told he or she can opt out, and is able to do so painlessly.

These are obvious and fair rules, but the debt collection industry is swarming the FCC to demand wide-open access to us at home, at work and on the go. We can win this tug-of-war if we out-organize the debt collection industry.
