

60002245157.txt

Dear Chairman Wheeler, I ask that you protect my free data! Our on-the-go society requires that we use our mobile and data connections at an ever-increasing rate. We need to be able to play online, receive texts, stream movies, track our steps, navigate the web, and do a million other things on our smartphones whenever, wherever, and however we want. That's why we need you to protect free data. Free data plans empower us to control how we use mobile services. Being able to stream as much music or video as we want is an incredible thing _ it frees up data that we can use any way we want. Free data lets us explore new information in new ways or lets us try out new applications. Free data plans are not only compatible with the FCC's open internet rules, they also create great chances for people to save their money and for small businesses to gain visibility in what has become an increasingly crowded field of online content creators and marketers. The vast swath of consumers say they are in favor of free data. So far, the FCC has taken the right path by allowing free data plans. It should continue on this path. The FCC should evaluate each new plan individually and only take action to prohibit a plan if a mobile provider or content company engages in bad acts that actually hurts consumers. The FCC should not categorically ban free data plans. As a generation concerned about our monthly bills and interested in getting the best the internet has to offer, we ask the FCC to continue to protect free data plans. There is no one-size fit all approach for how we use our smartphones to get online. But one thing is for sure _ the FCC should support and encourage free data plans.