

The cellphone tracking proposal infringes on personal privacy.

There are currently no laws that allow widespread tapping of wire phones, so tracking cellular phones seems to unfairly single out cellular phone users.

There is no pressing need to track the location of fifty million average citizens.