

Dear Sirs, I strongly disagree with the recent decision to rule ISP calls as long-distance services. This choice will cripple our nation's economy and destroy the progress we have made through internet collaboration. The FCC has made a grave error and the citizens, myself included, will not stand for this kind of misguided rule-making.

Please reconsider that ISP calls are always made and terminated within a local area and long-distance charges have no place infringing on our digital communications.

Pehr Anderson
MIT Media Lab