

Dear FCC Commissioners & Staff:

I receive internet service from Iglou a local internet service provider, based in Louisville, and a DSL line from Verizon. It is my understanding that the FCC is considering regulations which would decrease access to the phone network by service providers such as Iglou.

I would like to strongly object to any such change. From my research, it appears that Iglou provides more variety of services to its customers than Verizon.

I have had very good service from both Verizon and Iglou. This is quite likely related to the existence of some competition in this business.

Thanks
Russell Brown
