

Dear FCC Commissioners & Staff:

My name is Ken Nelson and I teach physics at the community college in Carrollton and in Louisville, KY. I have a web site at the college which I maintain. Maintenance means loading files, daily, via ftp from my home. Students often e-mail me for grades or with questions. I use Iglou, a local ISP. It is not clear to me that a major internet provider would do me any good. If they try to limit me, in an attempt to get me to use their services, they might just make it impossible for me to do business. The internet seems to be heading down the path of unsolicited e-mail(spam) which threatens to make e-mail unuseable. Iglou tries to limit my receiving spam which I I am appreciative of. Its not clear to me that the big guys would be so helpful. Limited ISP to the big guys might make the internet like the airlines. Thirty years ago our airlines were the envy of the world. Not so today but lets not go there as I can give a much longer rant on the airlines than you want to hear.

Sincerely,

Ken Nelson
