Supplemental Filing:
The Impact of Cable Modem Service on the Public Right of Way

August 2002

This is a supplemental discussion of the burden imposed by cable modem service on the public rights of way (ROW). Contrary to the suggestions made by other submissions in this proceeding, the provision of cable modem service does require a far more elaborate cable system than does video.¹

It is simply incorrect to contend, as do some filings, that adding cable modem service to a video-only cable system entails infrastructure and equipment changes only at the headend and subscriber premises (Matt-does this need cite?). On the contrary, significant, costly, and burdensome physical upgrades are necessary to transition a video-only system to advanced two-way services, as is discussed in detail in Columbia Telecommunications Corporation's (CTC) filing of June 15, 2002.

For example, consider the burden imposed by the construction of conduit in the public ROW to house all the additional fiber necessary to offer advanced, two-way services. Most of this fiber, and the conduit, is not necessary in a system that provides only digital and analog video services.

Fiber optic cable must be housed in conduit or must be armored. Unless armored, it cannot be direct-buried, which would be cheaper and less burdensome to the public ROW. The cable industry generally uses conduit to house underground fiber optic cable because conduit provides greater flexibility, scalability, and ease of repair.

The construction of conduit in the public ROW is usually accomplished by trenching (digging a trench down the ROW, laying the conduit in it, and then burying the conduit) or by boring (tunneling under the ROW approximately every 30 feet or more and then linking the tunnels).

The burden on the public ROW is not limited to the actual construction and placement of conduit. Related burdens include locating pull-boxes, vaults, or manholes in the public ROW approximately every 500 feet and at every intersection for the following reasons:

- To provide for future access to the conduit;
- To provide for future interconnection sites for the fiber;
- To store cable slack that will enable future repair or relocation;
- To protect cable splices, which have to be in sealed splice enclosures and cannot be direct-buried; and
- To place the conduit under the road.

¹ This Report refers frequently to "video-only" or "video" cable services. These terms are meant to refer to both analog and digital cable services, including traditional broadcast, pay-per-view, and multiple-channel programming (such as sports events with choice of camera angle or audio).

Pull-boxes and vaults range in size from a small to a large refrigerator. They generally do not enable access other than by hand and allow for only limited storage of slack or splicing.

Manholes tend to be far larger, sometimes as large as a room-size vault. They enable underground entry by cable company personnel in order to enable splicing, cable break-out, storage of slack, and other cable maintenance. Both pull-boxes and manholes are generally accessed through a hand-hole or manhole in the public ROW.

Burying such boxes underground requires digging large holes in the public ROW, frequently in the road itself. Extensive repair is necessary to the public ROW, particularly the roadway, after the construction of conduit. Unfortunately, the repairs are frequently substandard and inadequate to return the public ROW to its pre-construction condition. As a result, the long-term burden of repair and reconstruction falls on the local government and on taxpayers.

DECLARATION OF DAVID L. RANDOLPH

1. My name is David L. Randolph. I hold a professional engineer (P.E.) license and a Masters of Science in Electrical Engineering. I have thirty-five years of experience in the cable industry, including operation, design, construction of new cable systems, rebuilds, and upgrades of over 200 cable systems using microwave, fiber optics, and active reverse. The cable systems I built or upgraded provide services including both analog and digital addressable technology, and high-speed two-way services. Most recently, I served as Regional Vice President for Engineering for Adelphia Cable for the West Coast and Southwest regions. In that capacity, I oversaw the consolidation, upgrade, and rebuild of numerous cable systems for such services as digital TV, high-speed data, and voice over IP.

2. I contributed to the August 2002 Columbia Telecommunications Corporation Supplementary Report titled "The Impact of Cable Modem Service on the Public Right of Way." Based on my knowledge and experience, the Report is accurate.

Verification

I declare under penalty of perjury that the foregoing is true and correct to the best of my knowledge and belief, and that this declaration was executed on August 5, 2002, in Apple Valley, California.
