

I believe this rule would be without practical merit. Further, I believe the burden placed on retailers would greatly outweigh any potential benefit.

Registration of this type of information for the number of transmitters would create tons of paperwork for medium to large sized retailer every year.

The subjective assessment of patrons by retail personnel as to the expectation that they may use the transmitter in a fashion contrary to regulation would require a psychological evaluation far beyond the normal scope of a retail relationship.

The vast majority of users of radio transmitting devices do so in compliance with regulations and with respect for others. The limited number who might be identified using information this rule would collect do not outweigh the administrative burden.

Thank you for the opportunity to comment.
David P Smith, W6DPS