

I believe we need to regulate rates of cable companies again. Rates for television/internet services are way out of line and so are programming rates for the cable companies (ie: espn's annual 20% rate hike). Competition is being stifled by those same companies who said in 1996 that competition would flourish under the new law. With more and more mergers between the companies soon one company will be providing service to the entire United State, which could only mean problems for consumers (prices will go through the roof with no competition). The best thing for consumers and the industry is to regulate it again.
