

I am opposed to any Federal regulation that requires ISP's and VOIP providers to allow easy wire-tapping of communication for law enforcement because it will stifle innovation. We are already far behind many countries in introducing fast broadband. If we implement something like this, do you think other countries will follow? Europe, maybe, but not China or India. They already want to develop their own OS so that they don't have to use an American devised OS, Windows. We need less federal regulations and more technological innovation, not more innovation-stifling laws.
