

This proposal, if put into practice, will severely undermine freedom of expression and thought as we know and enjoy it today. Moreover, the very function of the internet is not designed for such surveillance, and as such, laws designed to enable such surveillance, if put into place, will require detrimental redesign of the network to meet the new demands. The internet is not designed for this, and should not be used for this. It was designed to withstand any external attack, and this will be seen as no more than such.
