

Your efforts to establish Low Power FM radio stations sound like a good idea, but not if it will boot the current stations off their broadcast. There are many stations in place currently that do not operate on this low level, but the nation is quite pleased with their programming, and would be distraught to see them replaced by a local organization.

One such station is K-LOVE. I cannot think of a more wholesome, honorable station. K-LOVE does not receive support from commercial organizations, it is completely listener supported, showing its success and relevance to communities everywhere. A station like K-Love is a haven for people everywhere, escaping the harsh and corrupt drivel of “popular” music these days.

I am a college student, living amongst many who support the blaring debauchery of rap and pop music, and my friends and I deeply appreciate the programming found on K-LOVE. We know we can hear uplifting and joyful music, and if it were to be replaced by a Low Power FM station where local school or traffic reporting news was broadcast, we would be bothered and upset. The convenience of K-LOVE being on the radio, as opposed to simply on the internet, is very important, for we cannot always be online or near a computer, yet we still want to hear its Christian programming.

Thank you for your consideration of this issue, and I hope it can be resolved in a manner that appeals to everyone.
