

Dear FCC,

I'm very concerned about this "documentary" that Sinclair is planning to run just before the election. I just dont think it seems right for them to be able to air it instead of regular programming just because they own the television stations. That is a huge power to hold in one's hands (control of television stations around the country) and I think this is a skewed and ethically questionable way to use it.

It makes me feel as if I live in Russia. or in some country in which the government controls the media. I understand that Sinclair is not the government but when they offer opinions as news and force networks to air it during primetime...well its just scarey.

I also just dont see how this can possibly be legal. Dont we have laws regarding election funding? At the very least it is yellow journalism, something that is from the past that needs to stay in the past. we shouldn't be moving backwards.

I think we need to have some stringer or new controls in place regarding how much power one person or company can have over the media. The idea that one company can alter the democratic process of the United States is absolutely terrifying.

Best wishes, and I hope you do take my comments into concideration,

Ashley
