

As a consumer of an independent ISP, I am very much against Bell South's proposal. Small companies are the backbone of the economy, and small ISP's give consumers choices that larger ones do not.

For example, my ISP, Sonic.net, provides shell access to unix servers which allows me to more easily transfer files from disparate computers. If large companies are free to squash competition, consumers like myself will suffer.