

The proposal by Bell South is an attempt to limit, thwart, and discourage innovation and development of the independent ISP market. The public is not served by consolidation of this industry. Rather, it is harmed. A large number of internet providers will ensure that the services provided quickly adapt to new needs and requests from consumers. Large institutions are notorious for their inability to quickly adapt, and Bell South is no exception. Bell South's petition should therefore be denied.