

To the Federal Communications Commission:

I left a few things out in my earlier correspondce expressing objections to the Consumer Bankers Association's Petition seeking an 'exception' to Indiana's Telephone Privacy Law. I am strongly opposed to the CBA's Petition seeking an exception to the subject Indiana law as it presently stands. My wife and I definitely don't want any unsolicited telephone calls of any kind and nature even if we'd had a relationship with the business caller. If they need to communicate with us, they can use ordinary mail. If I need to talk with a banker about a home equity loan, new credit card, refinance or something like that, I'll call him or her. Oh yeah and all those lawn service businesses, home remodeling operations, vacation package vendors, French ski resort operators hawking American business, etc etc. Please, I ask the FCC not to grant the CBA's Petition which would create an exception to and weaken Indiana's Telephone Privacy Law. Before the Indiana Telephone Privacy Law went into effect, you wouldn't believe all the calls we'd get----a flood of them. My wife of course being the kind soul that she is would listen to what they had to say because she didn't want to be rude towards them. As for me I could easily say 'No' and then end it there but they could keep my wife hanging on the phone line for some time and prey on her politeness.

They can send me regular mail and/or even more spam email. My Outlook junk mail filter works pretty well to catch most of it and eradicate it. However I don't want them ringing our home telephone, especially during Super Bowl weekend when the big game is on TV and I can't afford to miss one play.
