

I have been a VOOOM subscriber for almost a year now, after dropping the Echostar service. Voom is the only current TV provider that is serious about supporting High Definition Television. While I am not 100% happy with the content that Voom provides: a dedicated homosexual channel and the inability of hiding the 'pay' Playboy channel from the channel lineup when browsing through channels, not to mention their bundling many 'normal' channels with their high-priced Vavavoom premium bundle, I believe that Voom should continue providing this service.

Selling the satellite to Echostar would make it near impossible for Voom to continue and it will be a step backward as far as the choices TV viewers have these days as Echostar has no serious committment to HDTV.
