

In the matter of Voom Television, I would like to comment.

I believe that competition is healthy and keeps everyone on their toes. With respect to the sale of certain assets owned by Cablevision otherwise known as Voom the sale of those assets appear to have no benefit to the consumer. That sale has the appearance of one company swallowing another. If the company Voom is in financial difficulty and the demise is evident, then the impact is a loss of competition and a strengthening of one of the two remaining providers. As a result of any action taken, I hope that my programming does not increase in cost and the amount of programming does not decrease.

Voom has given notice to the public that it intends on shutting down its services the end of March. Voom has collected fees from me in advance for programming after its shutdown date.
