

Concerning the sale of Voom licenses to Echostar, I think it is in the best interest of the people that Voom be able to continue to use those licenses for high definition programming. Based on Echostar's past actions, if they acquire the licenses they most likely won't be used for HD programming. Voom is clearly the leader in this area, and just needs time to grow. More competition will force the other two DBS providers to broadcast more HD programming. If Voom loses the licenses, clearly the public will be worse off since Echostar isn't interested in high definition, only making a profit in the near term. Please give those with vision a chance to triumph over mediocrity and the status quo.
