

No...

In the digital world, the consumer can regulate programming via their set top box. Although the default setting could be for family values programming with the consumer being able to tune into whatever, R, X, violence, government infomercials; all by password or such.

The bottom line is that we need freedom of speech and expression to rein.

Let's not let the religious far right mess up any of our digital offerings including the net.

Thanks.