

Before registering with the "Do Not Call" list, we were up to an average of "21 phone calls" every weekday. Not only were the calls a nuisance (waking up baby; interrupt dinner; etc.) but they would disconnect us from the internet and each rehook-up would cost a charge. What a blessing to have the "Do Not Call" list in its present state -- for, I'm sure you realize, how many businesses and organizations claim they "have had a relationship" with us because they are somehow a subsidiary down the line. I'm not certain how the penalties could be verified or enforced (I.e. if the business claims they have had a relationship) of the calls our family deems as bending or breaking your new ruling.

On the side of the "charities", etc... We are very much concerned and responsibly research various charities and non-profit organizations that we give to each year. NEVER EVER has a phone call influenced our choices.

Thank you for hearing my comments. Cindy
