

I oppose the petition by the Consumer Banker's Association (CBA) to strip the Indiana's do-not-call law that has been extremely effective in only allowing banks with a true relationship with a consumer to contact a customer. Calls from banks that desire to telemarket are bothersome and unnecessary. Consumers are able to contact a bank themselves if they wish to create a relationship with them. Telemarket calls only cause frustration and anger among consumers and Indiana's law is effective to keep consumer's privacy from being invaded by commercialization.
