

Please do not regulate VoIP in the same manner as wireline telephone services. There is a clear difference between sending and receiving voice over your computer (or end-user computer equipment) and picking up a telephone handset plugged into the wall. VoIP seems to still be in the beta-testing phase and needs latitude to innovate. At the time that it gains a competitive percentage in the communications market, new regulations should be written that fit the exact protocol(s) rather than the general idea of communications.
