

Attaining security in the airports necessarily imposes delays. That's fine - you go to the airport earlier and you comply with the system as it evolves. One way to cope with that if you fly frequently is to join a club that allows you to function in business during these dead zones in your schedule. The President's Club was a pioneer in providing free wireless internet service and removing that capability will be a huge step backward. My personal productivity will be reduced if I am reduced to waiting on line to connect for e mail. How is it possible that your agency cannot find an acceptable solution to sustain this important service?
