

Cable television has become a modern necessity. Through that cable you get your internet services, TV, and possibly phone service. Yet it is a monopoly. Consumers only have one choice in this mode of communications. As the telephone services and utilities have been forced to open to competition, so too should cable service. Yet it is governed by localities. New franchises and existing ones should be modified that the cable laid can be used under fair contracting, to competitors.