

In this country (USA) it is not the role of government to control what the public is allowed to watch or listen to, not the role of government to manipulate or "balance" what the public sees or hears. If the general public tends to watch certain major network programs, that is their choice and their business, and that is the way it should be. The FCC should not be trying to take that freedom away. Instead you should be working to increase competition and choice for the public by removing out-of-date laws that are preventing or restricting competition and choice.
