

I view with alarm the increased movement to interfere with the freedom of new and growing communications media. The FCC, like any bureaucracy, tends to want to build its influence, thinking that doing so will increase its "good works" in the name of the American people. However, by its very intention to do "good things," it becomes a burden by promulgating regulation that, by their very number, become onerous and burdensome. Instead of looking to widen its sphere of influence, the FCC should research, evaluate, and eliminate existing regulation that restricts competition.
