

In the past two weeks I have seen a total of five alerts on the television concerning "tests" and not actual emergencies: two within minutes from the same station, and one every day for three days during news broadcasts. The first three were to be on a weekly basis, the other two were on a monthly basis.

I can understand having these alerts because a state of war exists. However, if the public is given too many of these tests they may not pay attention to them (The Boy Who Cried Wolf syndrome)

These alert tests can be annoying rather than informative.

May I suggest that a one Alert test for all channels be given once a month except when a threat may be imminent according to the Red, Orange, Yellow, Green system.

Thank You for your attention
Edward C. Zimmerman, Jr.
USSUNITEDSTATES@Yahoo.com