

Freedom Unlimited!

It seems to me that the Internet, as it now exists, is truly our last hope for free communication between various segments of the population. The freedom of communication, this ability to structure as informed citizenry which our founding fathers said was essential for a democratic country is essential to our survival as a democracy.

Alas, the remaining newspapers in the country are held by only a few corporations so that our print news does not offer the variety and differences of opinions which was available thirty or forty years ago. Television - that vast wasteland - offers little or nothing to educate the public about problems and solutions of the nation - or state= or city in which they live.

The internet does. With blogs, with My tube and Utube, with the ability to circulate to a broad spectrum of people alternate news.

the internet cannot, must not be turned over to private corporations.

ps. I'm 79 years old and have sadly watched the demise of an informed public throughout the United States.
