

The government must protect our airwaves from the same corporate gatekeepers that have stifled innovation and competition in Internet markets.

Time and again the FCC has giving control to big business and forgot all about the little guy they were created to protect.

To restore America's leadership in high speed Internet services, the FCC must ensure that the upcoming auction sets aside at least 30 MHz of spectrum for open and non-discriminatory Internet access. This will guarantee that new entrants have the opportunity to enter the market in competition with incumbent providers.

It would be a big mistake to hand over these airwaves to the very same phone and cable companies that dominate the wireline market. We need more competition and innovation, not more of the same. This new wireless spectrum must be open and neutral so that America can build a better Internet for everyone.

Once more the FCC can prove they are nothing more than a rubber stamp for big business or try something different and do their jobs and keep what's left of the airwave open to all.
