

I am writing to urge the FCC to set aside spectrum for open and non-discriminatory Internet access.

The U.S. is lagging behind other countries in so many areas it is shameful, embarrassing, and immoral, and we cannot afford to add our lack of affordable, high-speed internet access to the list. Internet access is today what electricity was a hundred years ago, and like electricity, it must be neutral and universally available.

We have to have real competition--rather than the corporate phone and cable domination we've had recently--to ensure our ability to economically compete and to ensure we have a thriving democracy.
