

Dear FCC, The internet is truly the last media open to the public voice in America. Over the past few years, the means for the average citizen to voice their ideas and proclaim their beliefs has dwindled. Big corporation has taken over and dictate what is heard by the population and what is not. The internet is a powerful tool for the common person to secure a platform. One channel for America to catch up to the rest of the world in high speed connection to the net is the airways. The government must protect our airwaves from the same corporate gatekeepers that have stifled innovation and competition in Internet markets.

To restore America's leadership in high speed Internet services, the FCC must ensure that the upcoming auction sets aside at least 30 MHz of spectrum for open and non-discriminatory Internet access. This will guarantee that new entrants have the opportunity to enter the market in competition with incumbent providers.

It would be a big mistake to hand over these airwaves to the very same phone and cable companies that dominate the wireline market. We need more competition and innovation, not more of the same. This new wireless spectrum must be open and neutral so that America can build a better Internet for everyone. We the people have a right to choices. To be heard, not silenced. Thank you,
Pamela Lampright
