

The government must protect our airwaves from the same corporate gatekeepers that have stifled innovation and competition in Internet markets.

America needs to be a leader in High Speed Internet Access if we want to keep our country strong. The internet has been a wonderful education tool for the youth of our country. For example my cousin is a child who grew up with the internet. Because of this she has always had access to information and it has given her a love of education that started very young. However she was blessed with the money to gain that access. In other countries access is increasing and the cost is dropping. It will not be long before America is left in the dust as big companies make it too difficult for poor families to have access to the internet, excluding the poor from the gift of the Internet. TO restore America's leadership in high speed Internet services, the FCC must ensure that the upcoming auction sets aside at least 30 MHz of spectrum for open and non-discriminatory Internet access. This will guarantee that new entrants have the opportunity to enter the market in competition with incumbent providers.

It would be a big mistake to hand over these airwaves to the very same phone and cable companies that dominate the internet market. We need more competition and innovation, not more of the same. This new wireless spectrum must be open and neutral so that America can build a better Internet for everyone.
