

I am contacting you in concern of the FCC turning over a large portion of public airwaves over to large companies, such as AT&T, Verison, and Comcast. I am concerned about these public airwaves because they are our airwaves, the public's, not theirs. Doing so would show how much you respect what is ours, and not theirs.

Think about this:

Wireless connections have been around for some time, an example being radios. I believe it is about time that we use these airwaves for more innovation, beyond the old radio. We could use this as the future to connect people, all across America, with no limits. America could even set the standard for all the other countries out there on internet service, but with these corporations giving us such low choices, we have fallen behind. I could get a service here with an 8 megabit connection for $40, or go to South Korea/Japan and have a 100 megabit connection for the same price.

If America could lead in Internet service we would, as I've said before, set examples. I believe this is why we shouldn't hand our airwaves to large corporations such as AT&T, Verison, and Comcast, but give it to the creative people, the people who will give it a use, not another way to just make more profit, which should be sent back into their networks for us anyways. Think about who is more important, the few that own companies or the entire population of the United States? America was built on equality, and apparently that isn't something you care about if you let them have the airwaves.

Sincerely,

Adrian Thayer of Washington State
