

I grew up in a small country city. All that was and is still available out there is dial up internet (running at a maximum of 2.7 kbps). Cable internet is not up and running, and there are no telephone companies close enough for DSL connection.

I fully agree that the internet providers in this country ARE charging too much for their services. With a monopoly in place as there is now, there is very little hope of those prices going down. Opening up the airwaves to the public would be a great way to create more competition for services lowering prices and quickly providing access to the rest of the country that is without.
