

How insane are we?

This is one of the most bizarre cases in a long time, when it comes to consumer protection being debated. It's open and shut: The telecommunications monopolies - and by the way, let's admit that's what they all are, collectively - should in no way determine content, or even have the potential to determine content, on the Internet. That is what losing Net Neutrality means. Their propaganda commercials we've seen on TV are disgusting lies.

Our government must represent the people's interests. Period. This is a bogus case. Throw the pigs out the door, and preserve Neutrality on the Internet.
