

Competition is critical to consumer choice, liberty, and the common good. There should be MORE satellite stations, not fewer. Even with only two, the public has no real choice. Both existing services have questionably explicit programming that is seriously degrading to society, including women, minorities, and the poor.

With competition, one can decide who to do business with, if either.

With only one service, people who wish satellite radio will be required to financially support a company that has offensive program (even if one can opt out, one helps them profit from smut).

Either offer many more licenses (and encourage development of more competition) or terminate BOTH licenses.

Don't you think this "merger" was in the plan 10 years ago when they both lied to obtain their present licenses?
