

Fundamental access to the internet is too important to today's economy and the United State's competitiveness to allow monopolies or semi-monopolies to have control over basic access, data rates, or even pricing. Think of a highway analogy. Broad access to the US Highway system enables massive commerce. The internet should similarly be unrestricted so that all types of internet commerce and services can exist and compete on a level playing ground.