

Those who believe that the merger will provide better service and the ability to hear multiple things that are now separate are naive. The reason that the two satellite radio companies have spent big bucks for some of these programs is to compete. To remove competition will remove incentive to offer better programming choices. I predict poorer service, less choice and higher rates if additional services are needed if this merger is permitted. This is an example of a poor business plan failing, and asking for government to bail them out at the expense of the public. The public will lose and only a few executives of the companies will gain before dumping the totally failed system at the expense of the smaller stockholders. This could make EXON seem like small potatoes.
